The four pieces in Eric Hibit's solo debut at Anna Kustera are meticulously campy. Resembling hipsters dressed to party, each of the paintings possesses a distinctive palette and a unique set of painterly moves, with obvious nods to '80s glam and '90s grunge. Black, gold, purple, and pink are Hibit's choices in Eclipse, a bewildering, bejeweled abstraction draped with golden tendrils and fragmented orbs. In Screwed, Hibit feigns artistic nonchalance, constructing a rickety wood frame to support an amorphous red-plaid form, splattered with plaster and surrounded by rainbow-colored bangles. Electric Milk is just too much: a paint-drenched puppy sits atop a dizzying field of multicolor stripes, with yellow-and-black balls supported by a network of string.
